

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation. In fact, I have contacted Sinclair (both on the corporate level and on the level of the local station) and they have refused to either discuss the issue or even listen to what I had to say. Sinclair alleges that the opposition to their anti-Kerry documentary is politically motivated. This is true. But for them to deny that their intended showing is anything other than politically motivated is laughable.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. They show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
